+852 PHOTOGRAPHY EXHIBITION

Finding glamour in unglamorous places is a photo exhibition that shows Hong Kong's deviation from traditional perceptions of beauty. The photos show gems in neglected alleys and forgotten street-corners and it gives a refreshing idea on glamour and beauty.

Photographer Saskia Wesseling allowed her senses to tune into the raw rhythms and patterns she encounters in the city – art in the boldness of ordinary things.

Wesseling's photos have also recently been used to tell a story in National Geographic Traveller UK (November 2017 issue). Earlier this year, she was travelling in the far North of Yunnan where she was able to capture pictures that shows Tibetans living a rural life high up in the mountains.

The South China Morning Post published a series about back alley hairdressers from Wesseling last Sunday, November 19th 2017. She stumbled upon the first backstreet barber while she was wandering around to find her beauty in unlikely places. After the first one she was so intrigued how it was possible to run a family business for decades in neglected alleys and on forgotten street corners, that she made it into a year long project to dig deeper and document the phenomena.
